

Tactics for getting a 70+ assignment

Part 1

This is often the main reason for which students are considering the use of a custom-made assignment. Achieving a 70+ assignment is regarded as a First Class and generates a deep emotion of pride and satisfaction in students.

The solution seems simple and without further reflection MBA students are looking for a reliable service provider.

Throughout our long-term commitment for offering a reliable and professional service to MBA students against their academic needs, it is evident that the context of one's studying is more important than the individual requirements.

You might wonder why this is so?

It is so because the details of a course of study are connected with a more dominant outlook that determines the relationship between tutors and students, but also, the academic performance and expectations the one party expects from the other.

MBA Winner proudly stands out for offering a personalised service where the individual matters more than the assignment. However, it is hard for us to prove our credential outside our repeated and referred customers that come to ask for help.

This article is an opportunity to cover some important ground that you need to be aware whether you make use of our service or not. Since the qualities of personal development and knowledge should not become intertwined with the maximization of economic profit alone we need to set the scene and help any user in making the right decisions.

Tactics Matter

Students are constantly advised to read more journal articles and spend countless hours understanding theories with which they identify to a much lesser extent.

This interplay of expectations often becomes dull and boring.

Academic tutors feel that they perform their duty by instructing students what to do.

At the same time, students feel that they are not getting enough for their money as they are not able to understand 'how' and 'why' they need to know all this information.

When we refer to 'tactics' we do not suggest 'methods' that include things like 'waking up early in the morning', 'spending 5 hours every day reading papers', 'making lots of comments from your lectures', etc.

Even though these practices can prove important and useful what is needed is understanding your own personal constraints and context of studying. Hence, there is an urgent need to put things in perspective.

This means that you ask yourself many hard questions about WHY, WHY, WHY, you are doing what you are doing.

It is imperative to ignore any associated with 'getting an MBA' as inadequate.

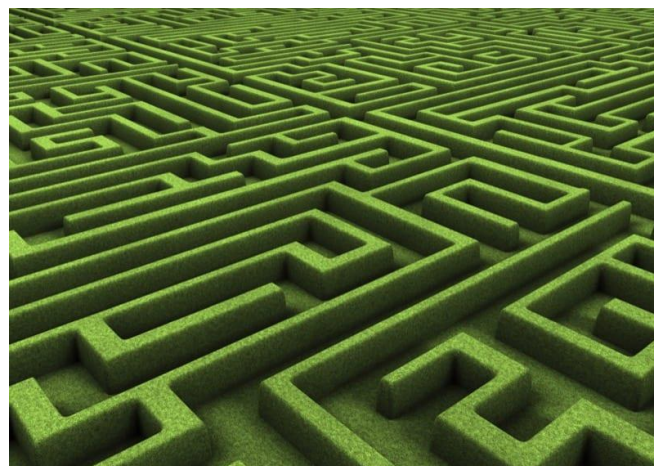

There has to be a much more personal reason to your study that connects the degree with your own interest and sense of enthusiasm.

Hence, we start with identifying 'tactics' as the earliest cornerstone to personal development and growth that begins with YOU and also ends with YOU.

Unless this very clear relationship is established any effort towards an MBA degree remains irrelevant.

The Labyrinth

From the very moment that you enter into any MBA programme you also enter into an unknown labyrinth. Your personal journey becomes a labyrinth simply because the academic, personal and professional expectations that you need to meet seem to be constantly moving.

You are becoming frustrated with seeming different suggestions and requirements coming from your academic subject tutors.

At the same time you become frustrated with getting different pieces of information when you ask your classmates about their opinion for the assignment.

At the same time you are feeling very tired with constantly having to adjust and readjust your way of working in order to meet all the different expectations.

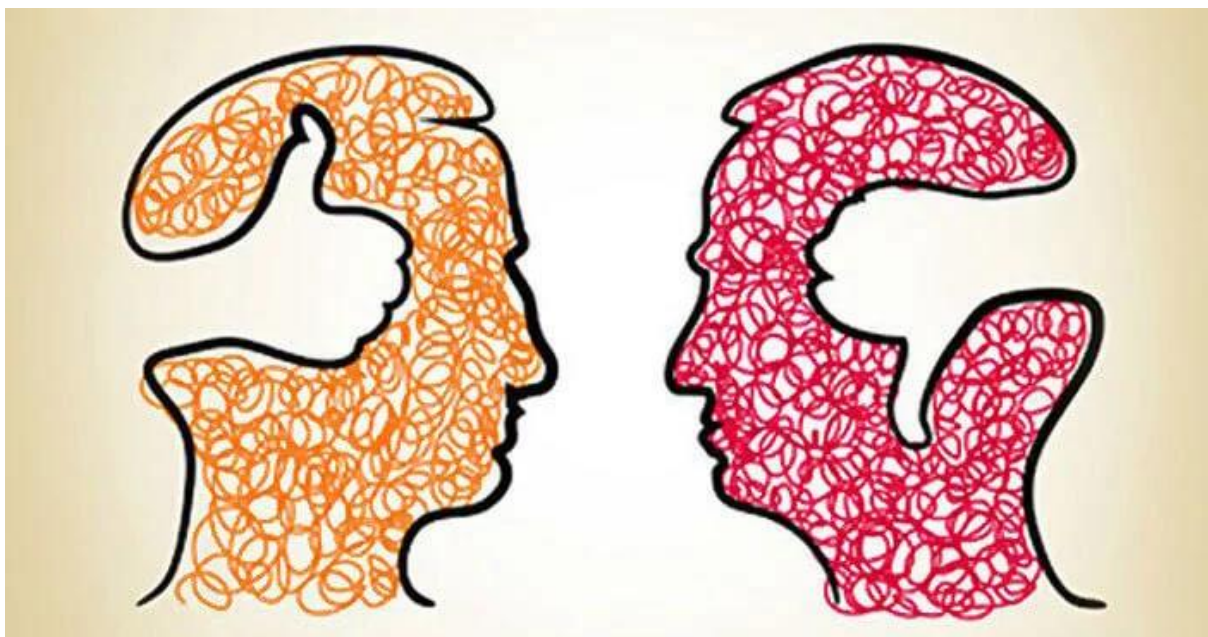

In order to be able to come out of the labyrinth you need to appreciate that there is a body of knowledge that determines how your academic tutors think and evaluate your academic performance.

This body of knowledge has nothing to do with the way corporations are running but is purely concerned with the development of valid claims and the legitimation of knowledge.

Even though you might consider yourself 'professional' in offering problem-solving suggestions to others you might be getting a very weak grade in your assignment for failing to account for the 'theoretical' aspects of your work.

By understanding the different 'pieces' that connect the way subjects and academic expectations are put together you will be doing yourself a great favour with finding a new direction for coming out of this labyrinth and for you which you will always remain grateful to your personal commitment and the advice you got in making this decision.

Right Questions Get The Right Answers

Academic tutors will not tell you the following but they are strongly biased towards you. They think that you might be approaching them in order to achieve a short-cut. They think that you are looking for simple and direct answers to the academic challenges.

You might be getting a very different reaction from what you might be expecting.

Tutors might provide you with little information and will also encourage you to go out and find the answer yourself.

However, such reaction is making you even more frustrated because you are confident that you are genuinely interested in learning and developing your knowledge.

In order to avoid getting into difficulties with your tutor spend time constructing questions that remain more 'subject-related' rather than 'assignment-related'. Hence, identify ways where you can ask questions that focus on the ideas and content covered in the lectures.

Identify areas that require further clarification and demonstrated that you have followed the content covered by your tutor. Moreover, identify a follow-up strategy where the questions are slowly emerging and they start with being 'generic' to becoming 'narrow'.

Avoid getting all your questions answered during the first consultation. Instead, plan for at least four consultations and demonstrate that there is a build up process in your understanding and thinking.

By developing this approach you will be winning the tutor to your side and you will find much easier to extract the relevant information.

By asking the right questions that do not suggest that you want direct answers to the assignment question, you demonstrate interest!

Your tutors will start paying more attention to you as an individual student and how you fit with the rest of the academic cohort.

If you are struggling with a particular challenge and would like to have access to constructive help then get in touch with MBA Winner. We will help you clarify your goals and we will make a positive difference by working with you in identifying the obstacles and how to best overcome them.

MBA Winner specialises on MBA assignments offering professional academic support and strictly adheres to ethical guidelines that ensure confidentiality and anonymity.

support@mbawinner.com