

The 'right' timing for using custom essay services

Students start looking for help when they start to struggle. Starting from the popular searching websites students start to Google search terms like 'custom essay' 'MBA essay help', 'essay help;', 'essay writing help', etc, in hope of finding an appropriate website to use. Custom writing websites have been flooding the World Wide Web recently promising the world!

Big statements focus on grade promises but also the timing with which the assignment can be returned back to the student.

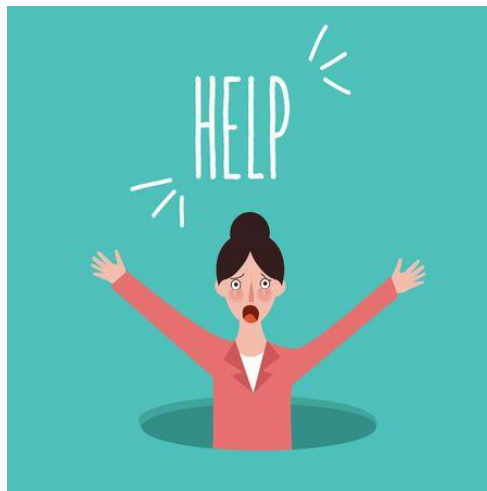

Without much background knowledge and feeling the growing anxiety of having to write the assignment, undergraduate and postgraduate students start to select those websites that seem to be more prominent. In particular, MBA students are looking for credentials which are important indeed!

However, the growing sense of frustration makes MBA students to override important information at the time of making the decision. However, such hidden information comes to be important and detrimental at the time of submitting the assignment.

In this article, we take the time to explore the concept of time and provide insight to many issues that you might experience when you want to use such services.

When do you need help?

It is common practice to ask help when you need it. Even though this might work when you suffer from some form of health issue, it does work when it comes to academic assignments. Your relationship with tutors is ongoing.

Regardless of whether you study through distance learning, or physically based at the university, you communicate important information about your capacity and capabilities as well as your engagement and motivation with your studies. From offering our academic services we have noticed that undergraduate but especially MBA students fail to realize the significance of rapport when studying. Students assume that tutors only address questions at the time of asking them. However, they don't realize that tutors are gathering information about individuals and at all times. Even though you might have never asked a question about the assignment, or demonstrated a lack of attendance in your seminars and lectures, it is true that tutors are noticing things that you might not notice yourself.

It is common practice for students to often completely ignore important elements of their programme study and then suddenly feel panicking about their assignments.

It is widely known that student attendance remains high during the first four weeks.

However, it declines considerably as students identify with the deadlines that they need to meet and with their own personal struggles. When doing the MBA degree attendance becomes even more critical.

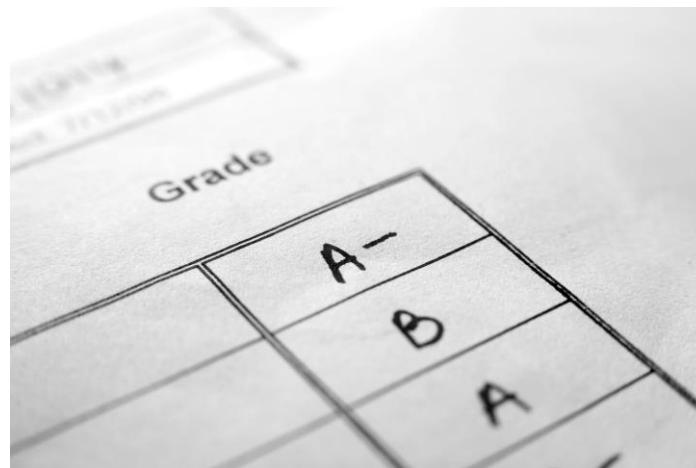

MBA students that failed to sustain a record of attendance find it increasingly difficult to associate with new information. As a result a sense of pessimism starts to develop. It is not clear how this sense of frustration is actually managed in the process. However, the experience of one's struggle remains a highly personalised issue and can affect one's thinking and forecasts about achieving goals.

Besides, the university environment becomes a new challenge in terms of networking, socializing and seeing opportunities of identifying with the academic aspects. The MBA brings excitement and a sense of change!

The Big Mistake

When students have to submit different pieces of work they usually make arrangements about the timing of completion. However, the amount of effort invested into a project often depends on the type of academic assignment and its associated grades. Universities often deploy two types of assignments, namely, the formative and the summative. Formative assignments are treated as forerunners to the summative assignment. Hence, students have the opportunity to test out their knowledge and understanding. However, grades received during the formative assignment do not count towards the final grade. It is only the summative assignment grades that count towards the business degree.

Some students have the tendency of submitting a poor piece of work thinking “it does not really matter since the assignment’s grade does not really count”. Such practice is common.

Without realising it students are giving out a lot of information about their attitude to their studies as well as engagement and motivation. When realising that the grade received from the assignment is not good enough then students start to consider alternative options.

One option is to use custom essay writing services. This seems the easiest option and the most effective! Hence, students spend considerable time of time researching about the different providers before ending up with using a specific one.

Once the assignment is submitted to the service agency then tutors take over. Trying to spend as little as possible students do not pay much attention on the wider context of service. Instead, they are only worrying about getting the assignment done and completed.

Once the assignment is completed in light of the assignment brief there is a strong sense of relief that the student can eventually submit her/his work! Following the submission the student is feeling excited about their decision and expect the highest grade possible as promised by the agency that undertook to provide its academic writing service.

However, what most students tend to ignore is that the actual grade seems to be much lower than the grade that was initially expected. Students are terrified by the prospects of receiving a grade that is just above the passing criteria and wonder why on earth this happened!

Getting Things Right

Now we come to the main part of our article where you need to pay most attention for your own personal learning. The majority of the students' writing offers a frequent pattern. Tutors are well aware of what to expect. They have read hundreds of similar assignments. They can identify how ideas emerge from the lectures covered or not.

Upon reading an assignment that remains 'unique' or 'outstanding' tutors go through a series of novel considerations.

- ❖ First, whether the student covered concepts and topics that were discussed in the lecture.
- ❖ Second, whether the student demonstrates originality of thinking and creative writing. By assigning the assignment brief to the agency students often undermine the social context of assignment grading. Hence, tutors are able to identify that specific ideas could not have been produced by the students.

There are a number of reasons for reaching such conclusion.

- First, the student's performance in the previous assessment was much more moderate. This means that the students could not have improved on their quality of writing so quickly.
- Second, the ideas discussed in the assignment demonstrate a specific pattern of development that is very different from what other students have produced.
- Third, the tutor does not recollect any actual engagement and discussion with the specific student about the assignment assuming that this is a piece of work produced by the actual student!

As a result of all the above reasons tutors know that they have the right to criticize the quality of the assignment on certain areas so that it does not get the grade that the student assumes that is possible.

Can this be a subtle tactic of revenge by the tutor?

It is possible!

Tutors might pass the specific assignment. However, they might not offer it the high grade that the student expects. It is not because the tutor has something personal against the student. Instead, the academic tutor is trying to exert force onto the student by recognising the subtlety of submission and therefore seeking to state an important point about her/his lack of naivety.

MBA Winner

Having helped many MBA students pass their assignments and dissertations MBA Winner stands out as a service provider on the basis that it does not simply produce custom-made work for its clients.

Our service is strongly customised to understanding your needs. We understand that producing an academic assignment is not going to be good enough for getting a good grade.

The 'war' between academics and custom-writing services continues to take place. Students can avoid considerable disappointment if they are not easily fooled by big claims and many promises.

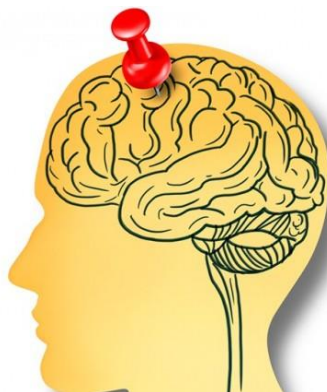

Professional writing agencies that truly stand out are those that really understand the individual circumstances, difficulties and challenges that the student experiences. Agencies and the tutors that provide the service often consider that this is too much to ask from them. Hence, agencies mainly focus on the final piece of work which is the assignment that needs to be submitted.

Avoid Disappointment and Mistakes

You can avoid feeling sorry for investing a lot of money for a service that did not satisfy your needs. This can be done by understanding that every time you engage with using a custom essay writing service you take an important risk. Namely, to attract the completion of your assignment's needs onto someone that does not fully understand and appreciate your own context of learning.

- Firstly, if the agency is truly willing to assist you will require full access onto the taught material. Hence, if you notice that the person in corresponded with you is only interested in the assignment brief then be very cautious.
- Secondly, professional agencies, that are not just interested in your money but in 'you' as an individual, would like to know what is going on with your own academic performance. However, this will require some actual time that would be incorporated into the final fees. If the agency is not able/willing to spend considerable time for understanding your challenges then be aware!
- Thirdly, a professional agency would like to know the history and the context of your performance in that particular module. This might include assessing the work that you produced previously and will make this a requirement before offering you with the service. You should be able to identify those agencies that want to get 'done and dusted' with you by considering the above factors.

Remember that you can do very little to change a grade that you got for your assignment. Moreover, your tutor knows that you will not create much of a fuss about your grade because any additional examination might put you into a difficult situation. Hence, your tutor knows that you are most likely to accept the final grade given no matter what!

MBA Winner has worked with many students and we position our professional services especially against MBA students.
